“ As an online friend of his, Asher, or Cairloaf, as I and many of his friends knew him, was such a joyful soul in the times we talked, we watched shows, played games together, formed such a deep bond in what seemed like such a short amount of time that I knew him.

His laugh was so genuine, so hearty and full of life, I truly won't forget the time I spent with him, and I know for a fact, he's still his goofy, lovable self up there.

Rest well, my long distance brother, we can finish Record of Ragnarok when I see you there.

“ my memories of the little boy he once was.
I can still see the little, loud, funny and energetic boy he was.

I can still see the memories of him just sitting calmly enjoying his favorite tv show, while me and his sister would play dolls.

I can still see the days when we would all live together cramped in 3 bedroom home and he would be outside on the trampoline enjoying himself.

I can still see how he loved his sisters so much and how much he had their backs.

I can still see how much he looked up to his older sister.

I can still see when he would fake drown with me in the kiddie pool.

I can still see the time when I had to get his big sister to “check” his classmates for talking bad about him. But he still had a smile on his face.

I can still see the very last day Asher and the fam left our house. As he was waving goodbye from the back seat of the car.

I can still see his big wide smile from the car as they began driving farther down the street.

I can still see the little sweet, caring and loving boy Asher was.

Not knowing that these would be my last few memories of with you.
I will always keep them close to me and remember you always.

Rest in Love 💕💕

- your cousin Mez ❤️👍

“ I first met Asher on October 24th, on my birthday, and I never imagined how much that moment would end up meaning to me. If I had never met him, my life would honestly look so different, because I wouldn't have met the people from the Discord server he made and the group that slowly became such an important part of my life. It all started pretty simply with me, Asher, and another friend making a server where we could just hang out, talk, joke around, and spend time together, but Asher was always there and somehow made everything feel more alive and welcoming. He had this way of being supportive and present that made people feel like they mattered, and for me he became more than just someone online he felt like an older brother. He was someone I could talk to, laugh with, and rely on when things weren't great, and he helped bring together friendships that I still have today. Losing him hurts a lot, and there are so many moments where I still think about the conversations we had and the time we all spent together in that server. I miss him deeply, but I'm also grateful that I got the chance to know him, because meeting Asher changed my life in ways I'll never forget, and the friendships and memories that came from that will always remind me of the kind of person he was and how much he meant to all of us.

“ A couple years ago on my birthday October 24th, I met my friend Asher while playing a game on Roblox. It was just a random moment at first, but we started too quickly became friends. asher made a discord server named “autism” It became our little community, full of jokes, late-night chats, and fun memories. Asher was always there for me, especially when I was feeling down, and he was like a brother to me. Even though he has passed away, I still miss him a lot and think about the memories we made. I’m really grateful that a simple game brought us together and gave me a friendship I’ll never forget.

“ Asher was a nice young man. As an online friend of his, I've only got good memories of him. He was always a joy to talk to, though we didn't talk all that much. Praying for your soul, Asher, and for the comfort of your family.

asher helped me alot. with life, school, and even with my mental health. he was like a big brother to me, but i never got the chance to fully express it to him how much he actually meant to me and the others that he blessed with his kindness.

i was having trouble with heartbreak, and he told me "you can make that peace for yourself. you dont need to burden your mind with those kinds of thoughts because they will not bring you farther." and i took those words to heart.

the last time we talked, was only a week before his passing. we were playing a game together, and i was having alot of fun playing it with him and a couple of his friends.

a friend of his named "alex" told me about it, and it left me in shambles hearing that he was gone.

im extremely sorry that this happened to such a kind soul, and i offer my condolences to those that raised him, and helped him grow into the person that he was when he was still with us.

Warmest regards,
Chris, otherwise known as "drip".

“ Asher, also known as Cairloaf online was genuinley a great friend. He was able to instantly light up the mood any time he was around, whether it was playing games or just simply calling. His simplisitc art style really stood out and I wish i could see more of his talents. Me and many other of his online friends mourn him, but we will continue to cherish the memories he left behind.
